In [13]: `#runtime_iqr`

The Interquartile Range (IQR) for the 'runtime_minutes' column in runtime_iqr dataset is 29.0. This value indicates the range between the first quartile (25th percentile) and the third quartile (75th percentile) of the data within this column. the IQR value of 29.0 suggests that 50% of the movies have a runtime between approximately 86 minutes (25th percentile) and 115 minutes (75th percentile)

The next code cell will create a visualization of this spread.

In [14]: import matplotlib.pyplot as plt
import numpy as np

Load the dataset
#df = pd.read_csv('runtime_iqr.csv')

Remove NaN values from runtime_minutes column
#iqr_df = df.dropna(subset=['runtime_minutes'])

Create a boxplot using Matplotlib
plt.figure(figsize=(10, 6))
plt.boxplot(filtered_df['runtime_minutes'].dropna(), vert=False, showmeans=True)

Add labels and title
plt.xlabel('Runtime (in minutes)')
plt.title('Boxplot of Runtime Distribution')

Show the plot
plt.show()
```

In [15]: # Find the smallest and largest values in runtime_minutes column smallest_value = filtered_df['runtime_minutes'].min() largest_value = filtered_df['runtime_minutes'].max()
print("Smallest value:", smallest_value)
print("Largest value:", largest_value)

Calculate the range
#value_range = largest_value - smallest_value

#print("Range of runtime_minutes column:", value_range)

Smallest value: 27.0
Largest value: 142.0

```
In [16]: filtered_df.to_csv('title_cleaned.csv', index=False)

In [17]: import pandas as pd

Load the datasets ready for merge
movie_budgets = pd.read_csv('budgets_cleaned.csv') imdb_data = pd.read_csv('runtime_cleaned.csv')
#imdb_data.to_csv

#imdb_data.head(200)
#imdb_data.to_csv(index=False)

I wanted to include all of the movie column values plus only the primary_title values that are in common with the movie column. This way I can have a larger data set to calculate most profitable genre and a realistic budget to achieve a quality film that is likely to sell well, based on the iqr of the genre with the highest profit ratio. Unfortunately a left join will not work in this case as many movie titles would have nan values under the Genre column. So an inner join was chosen.

In [18]: # Merge datasets based on 'name' and 'primary_title' columns
# Perform the merge

Get the common columns between 'movie' and 'primary_title'
common_columns = set(movie_budgets.columns).intersection(set(imdb_data.column

#Filter the DataFrame to include columns from 'movie' and common columns from merged_data = merged_data[list(movie_budgets.columns) + list(common_columns)]

Save the merged DataFrame as a CSV file without the index column
merged_data.to_csv('merged_data.csv', index=False)

Unfortunately cannot use the left join below as some movies will have no genre column values. So the data set will be around 2000 only.

In [19]: #merged_left = pd.merge(movie_budgets, imdb_data, left_on='movie', right_on='

The 'profit_ratio' column has been added to the 'merged_data' dataset and represents a numeric value that signifies the ratio between the worldwide_gross revenue and the production_budget of each movie. This allows direct comparison of the profits of all movies in relation to their budgets.

This below strategy was abandoned as it was decided too blunt to arbitrarily remove all genre descriptions after the first word.

Extract the first word of each genre and create a new column 'genre_group'

merged_data['genre_group'] = merged_data['genres'].str.split(',').str[0]

Count the unique genre groups based on the first word or string of each genre

unique_genre_groups = merged_data['genre_group'].nunique()

print(f"There are {unique_genre_groups} unique genre groups based on the first word of each genre.")
